Hoffa Wins Fight Against Watchdog Board

WASHINGTON (AP) — James Hoffa called a convention. The union boss said he would win. Today Hoffa told the delegates he would have to accept a loss. The Teamsters Union, once thought not to be negotiable, will now be kept in business by the federal government.

Hoffa, the president of the Teamsters, said the strike against the United States Postal Service would end next week. He also said the Teamsters would accept a new contract that would guarantee the union's continued existence.

In Greenville's 40 year evolution perhaps the most widely used was the demolition of an old house. The house was taken down to make room for a new telephone book. There was great opposition to the idea, and the Delta Undertaking Co. was hired for the job.

Orders were placed for the new telephone directories in the spring of 1961, which was mailed today to more than 14,000 subscribers. The book is designed to handle 3,000 names, and the company already has taken orders for 14,000 names. The book will be mailed next year.

Bygone Era Of 'Old Greenville'.

Greenville used to sport a variety of businesses. House numbers were assigned to each person in the town, and you were expected to know who lived at the house before you could call a person. The company also required that you call them by name, not by business.

But the company allowed you to call any number you had memorized, and you were allowed to use the phone book to find names. The book was used to find people, and the company allowed you to use it as a reference guide.

The book also included a lot of historical information about the town, and it was used to find out who had died in the town. The book was used to find out who was alive, and it was used to find out who was dead.

After the book was finished, it was shipped directly to Greenville and Samuel Penney. The book was used to find out who had died in the town, and it was used to find out who was alive.
